

ABOUT THE AUTHOR

JOHN WINDHAUSEN, JR. provides legal, legislative, and regulatory consulting services to a variety of nonprofit and corporate entities through his firm, Telepoly Consulting. After beginning his career as a staff attorney with the Federal Communications Commission in 1984, he moved in 1987 to the staff of the U.S. Senate Commerce Committee, where he served for nine years. His work included the Cable Act of 1992, the Spectrum Auction Act of 1993, and the landmark Telecommunications Act of 1996. In 1996, he became general counsel of a consumer advocacy organization called the Competition Policy Institute. From 1999 to 2004, he was president of the Association for Local Telecommunications Services (ALTS), the leading trade association representing the facilities-based competitive local exchange carrier industry. He recently is the author of “Good Fences Make Bad Broadband: Preserving an Open Internet through Net Neutrality” (Public Knowledge, 2006) and “A Blueprint for Big Broadband” (EDUCAUSE, 2008). He is a graduate of Yale University and the UCLA School of Law.
